This course examines the history of indigenous North Americans from the period immediately preceding the arrival of Europeans in America to the close of the nineteenth century. The course does not simply describe Anglo-American attitudes and beliefs about Natives, nor does it focus primarily on U.S. Indian policies. Rather, the course attempts to illuminate the various viewpoints from which both Indians and whites perceived their historical relations. Particular attention is given to Native beliefs and values, social and cultural ideologies, and cultural change prompted by contact with whites. The course’s broadest goal is to provide a general knowledge of the Native American experience in the United States. In addition, it strives to reach a number of more specific goals. First, the course seeks to explain the various strategies that Indians followed in responding to the European conquest of America and the eventual establishment of Anglo-American social dominance. To this end the class will examine forms of Indian resistance, and aspects of Indian cultural continuity and change. Second, the class demonstrates that Indian history is not peripheral, but rather is central, to U.S. history. Finally, the course argues that neither Indians nor indigenous cultures are “disappearing.”
