The greatest failure of contemporary education has been precisely its inability to help teachers understand the ethno-linguistic complexity of children, classrooms, speech communities, and society, in such a way as to enable them to make informed decisions about language and culture in their classrooms.”

—Ofelia Garcia

…the language of authority never governs without the collaboration of those it governs, without the help of the social mechanisms capable of producing this complicity, based on misrecognition, which is the basis of all authority (Bourdieu: 1991, p. 113)

One constant in the study of language and education is the connection of particular instances of language use to larger social patterns. From the “mismatch” hypothesis, which sought to explain schools’ role in social reproduction as a result of incongruent linguistic and cultural styles, to more contemporary studies of language and power and language ideologies, the intersection of language and social process is critical to understanding schooling and education. We emphasize the systematic, arbitrary, and anthropo-political nature of human language. Of particular importance are the educational implications of the fact that certain language varieties (i.e., nonstandard dialects) are stigmatized as inferior to others, and the power relations embedded in “the economy of linguistic exchanges” (Bourdieu). Topics include dialect variation, classroom discourse, language socialization, second language acquisition, bilingual education, and literacy, with special attention to the ways in which ethnicity, race, class, and gender are constructed by the use of—and attitudes toward—language in educational settings (in schools and communities).
