Syllabus

This course provides a broad overview and analysis of U.S. foreign policy since the beginning of the twentieth century. No prior background in international relations is assumed. Students will broaden their understanding of the history of U.S. foreign policy, explore the roots and challenges facing the current liberal international order, and develop analytic tools necessary to understand future U.S. foreign policies.

All times listed on this syllabus are for the Pacific time zone. Assignments must be submitted on Pacific time regardless of where you may be living or submitting your work.

On the Canvas course page, under Modules, you will find all lectures, readings where available electronically, quizzes, and weekly discussion questions. The modules page will be your most effective guide to the course.

Lectures

This course will be taught asynchronously. Lectures will be pre-recorded and posted to the course webpage on Canvas in advance of their normally scheduled times (listed below for information). There are 19 lectures scheduled. Each lecture may be broken up into shorter segments and will be designated, for example, as Lecture 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, etc. Students are responsible for the material in all segments of the lectures (as well as readings) on the quizzes for the appropriate week (see below).

Open Discussion Sessions

On Thursdays from 2-3 PM, I will be available for group discussion via Zoom. Nothing can substitute completely for a live in-person class, but this is an opportunity to ask questions about the readings or lectures and raise issues for discussion with me and your fellow students. I will not be covering additional material in these sessions, only answering questions you might have or addressing issues you would like to discuss (this can include current events). Under university rules on remote teaching, these synchronous group discussion sessions are not required and no course credit is assigned for participation. The group discussions will be recorded and posted to Canvas for students who choose not to or, because of scheduling issues, cannot participate directly. Participation in the discussion presumes your consent to the recording of these sessions.

Readings

There are two books available for this course which can be purchased through the UCSD bookstore or online. I strongly urge that you purchase the basic history text by LaFeber. We will read much of this book and, unfortunately, it is not available electronically. Additional readings will be available on Canvas. More contemporary topics towards the end of the quarter are covered mostly in articles. All articles are available online through the UCSD library web portal (needed to be logged in via VPN to UCSD).

Grades

Grades for this course will be based on three response papers, each 25% of final course grade, due on the dates on the schedule below. All papers will be inspected by Turnitin.com through the Canvas portal.

There will also be weekly online, asynchronous quizzes, which altogether constitute the remaining 25% of the total course grade. Each quiz covers the readings and lectures for that week. Quizzes will open on Thursdays, 3 PM and will close on Saturdays at 2:59 PM. All quizzes must be completed within this 48-hour window.

Missed deadlines may be made up only after a Doctor’s note is submitted explaining why you were too ill to submit the paper on time or take the quiz. If you “forget” to take a quiz within the allotted time period, there will be no makeup option. No exceptions.

All assignments are subject to UCSD’s academic integrity standards (see Canvas).
