This class explores “organic” social movements among indigenous and ethnic communities. A primary purpose here is to acknowledge and emphasize communities that are subject to social, political and economic forces in local settings and global arenas which illustrate native resistance and the formation of indigenous leadership. Borrowing from Antonio Gramsci’s notion of the “organic intellectual” the premise of the course is that all communities and groups of individuals produce natural leaders who not only interact with repressive forces but utilize existing social processes, political structure, and native resources in planned and organized resistance. We will explore four primary examples that illustrate such resistance and mobilization aimed at social-cultural and political-economic change. This includes: two Chicano/a communities in San Diego (Lemon Grove and Logan Heights); the Kuna Indians of the Comarca of San Blas, Panama; Pacific Islanders of Micronesia, and the Zapatistas of Southern Mexico. Of crucial importance here is both understanding the historical forces that created the conditions for people to act, as well as the social-cultural foundations/traditions people utilize in fighting repression and claiming rights.

Class Requirements

Students are required to attend lectures and complete all readings by the assigned dates. Each student will write a research paper (8-10 pages) on a specific social movement or theme that is central to the course. An optional book review essay (6-8 Pages) may be submitted for extra credit. All topics must be approved. There will be two quizzes, a midterm exam and a final exam. All requirements must be completed in order to pass the course. For the final grade, these requirements are weighed as follows:

- A. Class participation 5%
- B. Quiz performance 15%
- C. Midterm Exam 25%
- D. Final Exam 30%
- E. Research Paper 25%
